

We all know that crows are smart birds. Here's another example gleaned recently from my neighbor John Borranda. He was walking his little dog along the Sharp Park berm while clutching a quantity of doggie treats, when he passed a crow on the nearby fence begging. So John tossed a treat or two in the crow's direction. A week later, John was again walking his dog along the berm, when the same crow recognized him and followed him as he continued along the trail, hopping from fencepost to fencepost until John tossed another treat toward the bird. John says, "There must have been 300 people walking along the berm at that particular time, but the crow spotted me and remembered having been gifted a treat by me."
